What are your feelings on animal welfare?	Emotions and feelings are subjective and cannot be measured directly. But we don't need direct evidence of how animals feel to achieve good animal welfare and for animals to live a good life. Preventing negative experiences can at best lead to a neutral state of welfare. A neutral state is where animals are surviving – they do not feel excessively hungry or thirsty or anxious. Good animal welfare, and a good life, can be achieved only when animals can also have experiences that they find rewarding and positive.
